Acknowledging there are “giants” in every profession, the field of education is no different. As a first-year superintendent, this could not have been more evident than in the spring of 2014, while attending my first WASA Superintendents’ Conference. It was shortly following my arrival that I found myself sitting at a dinner table listening to an insightful conversation about timely and relevant educational topics that could not have been replicated or taught in a course. Rather, it was a dialogue that could only take place within a gathering of educational leaders—where the collective wisdom of those who I would soon refer to as mentors was on full display. Recognizing I was clearly surrounded by greatness—wide-eyed, and awestruck—a close friend, colleague, and mentor leaned over and stated, “This is what it means to be a WASA member. We are sitting amongst some of the giants in our profession tonight. They have learned from those who have preceded them. They are true legends of the profession who have made it their own. We are all standing on the shoulders of giants.”

Later that evening, attempting to absorb all that I had just experienced, I found myself floored with a deep sense of gratitude and appreciation, not only for my colleagues, but for what I had come to know of WASA—a transformative, equity-driven organization, working tirelessly to bring educational leaders together, lifting each of us to see more and farther.

Happy 50th Anniversary WASA!

JOHN DEKKER REFLECTS...

A Legacy of Support

Upon joining the WASA team in 2001 as Assistant Executive Director, and over my 16-year tenure, I had the unique opportunity to work in support of four WASA Executive Directors who were visionary leaders. My role at WASA included three areas of responsibility: direct service to members, liaison to the WASA Small Schools Committee, and emergency support to school district administrators. I felt particularly blessed to have had the privilege to serve school district leaders!

In 2010, WASA leaders met to reflect on our mission and to re-brand, refresh, and clearly articulate the organization’s purpose. The tag line Leadership | Trust | Advocacy was born defining the history and the hallmark of the organization to this day. Few decades have tested the resolve of school district leaders and WASA more than the second decade of the 21st century. Criticism of public education and calls for public funding of private education deflected attention from the central issue: that public education was significantly underserved. Calls for improved funding and fair teacher pay were often met with increased regulation, greater expectations measured by standardized testing, and teacher and administrator evaluation reform . . . but without additional funding.

WASA took the lead advocating for equitable, sustainable, and ample state funding with the Stable Funding Committee, the Local Funding Workgroup, and joining partner organizations, including the School Funding Coalition. These efforts provided a rubric by which to judge various legislative funding initiatives. WASA advocated for funding solutions that served districts east-to-west and small-to-large.

District leaders faced tremendous challenges to match fiscal resources with the needs of employees whose compensation had lagged behind the private sector. Following the McCleary lawsuit and subsequent changes to basic education funding, Legislators reported to the public that the school funding dilemma had been addressed and even implied that districts were “flush with cash.” Districts faced the reality that new basic education funding had been largely offset by reductions in categorical revenues and new restrictions to raising funds locally. Many districts were simply unable to meet employee expectations at the bargaining table. As WASA’s “point person” to assist districts facing potential employee strikes, the requests for assistance increased from three or four per year to dozens by 2015.

WASA increased its capacity to support districts by partnering with AWSP, WSSDA, and ERIN to deliver bargaining crisis resources through regional workshops. Andy Welt joined the WASA team in 2016 to partner with me in support of districts facing imminent strikes. To meet the challenging; the headlines; the crisis, WASA partnered with WSPRA to develop SCAN (School Communication Assist Network), a network of communications experts who stand ready to quickly assist districts facing emergencies of all types. Andy came on board and “hit the ground running,” to continue WASA’s legacy of support to school district leaders across the state. Whether is it Management Reviews; employment contract reviews; Board/supervisor relations support, or crisis intervention, WASA stands ready to serve. Each decade has its unique challenges but WASA’s resolve to serve through leadership, to promote support of public education through advocacy, and to earn the trust of its members, and the public at large will continue to be its hallmark.
